As both a licensed Architect and NCIDQ-certified Interior Designer, I support the ability for Certified Interior Designers to stamp their own work. I found the testing for NCIDQ possibly more stringent and specific to health and safety than the architectural exams. These designers are qualified to apply, obtain and maintain permits for projects of a certain size and complexity. We have been in the position (as Architects) of helping designers get permits for their work. Many times, we are an added tax to the project and our skill set is a duplicate of what the NCIDQ designer brings to the table.
