In the initial map, 2 of my properties (irrigated farm land) were classified as high risk while another one that is surrounded by a dryland field that is mowed annually before fire season was classified as extreme while a neighbor across the street with a house surrounded by trees overhanging the house was classified as moderate. I think we simply need to stick with the classifications of forest, mixed, urban, or farm. Insurance rates should be determined by boots on the ground inspections and/or history of claims, not some map that makes it easy for insurance companies to jack up rates.
